1861. The Proclamation of Price, which we publish in our telegraphic columns this morning, is very significant although a very ridiculous affair, being a sort of prove of treachery of Lincoln's celebrated cry just before Richmond fell.

A traitor has sold his kingdom for a shilling.

We are not sure, however, that the proclamation was not originally written in verse, to the soul-stirring refrain of "We must have 100,000 men," and irreverently broken into prose by the telegraph.

We begin to lead steadily to this view.

The more we think of it the stronger we have.

The proclamation is a very ridiculous affair, being a sort of prove of treachery of Lincoln's celebrated cry just before Richmond fell.

It is a traitor's cry.
